Jack had made the boys tie Wilfred up for no reason, and was planning to beat him up in front of all the other boys. They must have seen us. The boys regress back into time, and become very brutal. Therefore, he assumes that life over there is meant to do everything he was prevented from doing in the adult world. But it is also too late for Piggy to make the irrationality of these savages turn into intellectual sensibility. In order to satisfy their necessity of food, Ralph empowers Jack to be the chief of the hunters, who are only those involved in the choir. However, the method Piggy has used to teach him how to blow the conch and the concerns Piggy has exposed to him previous the first assembly, make Ralph acquire certain maturity. How does he say it? Then, contradictorily, he publicly declares the others to follow the rules because they are not "savages". Ralph presumes his opponent is going to aggrieve and revenge sooner or later; in consequence, he is prepared to appraise Jack as a brave hunter to make him feel as an important adventurous chief for hunting and bringing food for everyone. However, he ignores his task when he starts developing an uncontrollable obsession for killing piglets. Their decadent physical change is caused by the necessity of killing a prey so that the piglets will not sense them when hunting. Jack emerges as a messenger of the Devil addicted to the powers of darkness, murder and death. The first impression we have of Ralph when he mocks Piggy's asthma is that of cruelty since Ralph shows himself as an immature and insensitive boy to get along with Piggy. Thus, when all the survivors are present and vote to choose the leader of the children, Jack makes haste to assure his leadership; "I ought to be the chief," said Jack with simple arrogance, "because I am chapter chorister and head boy" " 22 His authoritative attitude intends to force the children to elect him as the leader, and he even protests when they do not approve his will. This is their highest inhuman aberration because the boys are consciously aware of what they are going to do. Defiantly, the Lord of the Flies also states that the boys' current wild madness and all of the bad fortune they have undergone on the island are a result of his mysterious force. It is a matter of intense horror when a large pig is killed and Jack decides to sacrifice the head of the pig to the beast. In fact, later, when Simon curiously approaches the head of the pig to contemplate its ugliness, we discover that indeed it is the demon. But Jack rouses to revolt by saying "You shut up! They are so immature and somehow innocent to harmonize and bring into agreement their various differing interests, their diversity of goals and their personal characteristics, that their intention to keep their human, civilized and social dignity becomes technically ineffective. Jack initiates his dominion of repression since he despoils Piggy to express his viewpoint on democratic basis. Therefore, Jack is a manipulator whose persuasive ideas have a misleading intention that affirms his fraudulent and corruptive nature. Deep inside, he strategically wants to stand out to gain status with his statement of following the rules due to the fact that he looks forwards for snatching Ralph's leadership and becoming the absolute ruler. plan to start a fire. Besotted with hunting, he enjoys the process of ending the life of piglets. He had not moved. This has been the big mistake of our dysfunctional society and that is why we will never be capable of achieving real civilization. However, it is already too late. By leaving a group of English schoolboys to fend for themselves on a remote jungle island, Golding creates a kind of human nature laboratory in order to examine what happens when the constraints of civilization vanish and raw human nature takes over. It also seems that the author of Lord of the Flies wanted to give us a warning and a guideline to be aware of our own incendiary evil conduct in this modern society. Piggy is indeed more realistic than Ralph and sees things as they are; "Did you hear what the pilot said?"
